SINGULAS CONFIRMANS.

A, a, Roman, A, a, Italian, both of most general use in writing the European languages; A a, English Saxon; the English black letter, nearly, as all the rest, resembling that of the German alphabet; A, α, Greek, called alpha, from the Hebrew א aleph, which, as all the letters in the Hebrew tongue are significant, denotes either an ox, or a leader, marks of excellence and priority. The first place is deservedly given to this letter on the account of its simplicity, being little more than an opening of the mouth; and its sound, as a vowel, (for it is properly a radical consonant, as are all the rest,) is determined by the adjunct vowel, if it has any; if not, it is silent, and has no sound. From this use of the Hebrews, the later Greeks seem to have taken their note of an easy breathing, which they prefixed to all words beginning with a slender sound, as in ἀπο, ἐπι, &c. to distinguish them from those which begin with an aspirate; as in ἁμα, ἑκας. This was done after they had divested the eighth letter H of the consonant power which it held in their ancient alphabet conformable to the Hebrew, to make use of its figure in denoting the long power of the vowel E. But the Latins followed them not herein, having formed their language from the ancient Æolians and Ionians, who had only the Cadmean alphabet of sixteen letters. But to proceed, the Latin and English A has the same power and figure as the Greek; but its name, as likewise the rest of the letters, from the simple sound a, be, ce, &c. In English we have a threefold sound of this vowel; short, as in bat, cat, &c. like the Hebrew pathahh; long, as in dāte, fāte, &c. mixed with o, obscure, as in call, fall, where we hear the same sound as in olive, hollow, save that in the former it is long, conformable to the Heb. ָ kametz, but in the latter short, conformable to ָ cateph kametz. It is greatly to be wished that we had more letters expressive of vocal sounds; or marks on those we have, to ascertain their power in the same syllable; as in fallow, falling; or in those which are analogous, as in cost, most, &c. The want hereof equally affects our Latin pronunciation; for we pronounce mălus and mālus, păter and māter, with the same sound, which we can scarcely think the Latins did. We are indeed more secure in the Greek tongue, because directed by more vowels, and the use of accents. But to return, A, before e and u in the same syllable, makes two diphthongs æ, and au, whereof the former in Latin is substituted both for αι the proper, and α the improper, diphthong of the Greeks, as in Αινειας Æneas, τη σφαιρᾳ, sphæræ; as, on the contrary, the ancient Latins in their own words, when they had occasion to divide their æ, changed it into the Greek αι; as in aulaī, pictaī, frugiferaï. Some make ai a Latin diphthong, as in aio, Cajus; but i manifestly belongs to the latter syllable, for the Greeks write not Γαιος, but Γαΐος; whence it seems to be very manifest that ai in the Latin tongue is not a diphthong, as in the Greek. As there is a mutual intercourse between all the vowels with each other, so in this a is changed into e; as in lacto, delecto, ago, egi; so e into a, as in decem, decanus; aveo, avarus; a into i, as in apiscor, adipiscor; so i into a, as reipsa, reapse; a into o, as in sparta, sportum, taxus, toxicum; o into a, as in foveo, favilla, volvo, valvæ; a into u, as in camera, cumera, taberna, contubernium; u into a, as in glubo, glaber, γυδάω, madeo. In the Roman comitia, or assemblies for making laws, the people had two tables; in the one were two letters, V. R. uti rogas, signifying their assent; because a motion for a new law to be made was called rogatio; in the other this letter A. i. e. antiquo, or antiqua probo, to show their dissent. In capital causes the judges had also two tables covered with wax, in one whereof was this letter A. i. e. absolvo; in the other C. for condemno; whence the former is by Cicero, pro Milone, called salutaris, the latter tristis. In numerals it denoted anciently 500, and Ā 5000. Other uses of this, and the rest of the letters, in the compendious notes of the ancients, are too many to be here enumerated; I have therefore under this, as well as the following letters, explained those which most frequently occur, referring the explanation of the rest to a more general Collection thereof out of Sertorius Ursatus, and others, which may be of use, sometimes, even to the learned themselves, in reading ancient inscriptions found upon Roman monuments and coins. A

A, a, Lat. ab A, α, Græc. Nam formas literarum veteres Græcas pene easdem fuisse, quæ suo tempore fuerunt Latinæ, testatur Plinius, 7. 58. Hanc vocalem ut insuavissimam notat Cicero in Orat. 49. quod tamen de crebrâ ejus repetitione accipiendum; nam in eâ sæpius iteratâ asperitatem notavit etiam Martianus Capella. Sæpe quidem in alias atque alias vocales mutatur, tam longas, quam correptas, aliquando fortasse suavioris soni causâ; sed cum hoc commune habeat cum reliquis vocabulis, imo et consonis, nihil hinc a primæ literæ dignitate abscedere videtur.

A, a preposition of the same signification, made from, and for the better sound used before consonants instead of,

Ab [ex ατο, recisâ ο, et tenui in suam mediam conversâ, emergit ab] a prep. governing an ablative case.

☞ It is used always before vowels, and frequently, especially by Cæsar and Livy, before all consonants, if v, x, and z, be not excepted.

It has a great variety of significations. (1) From. (2) By, after a verb active, passive, or neuter, denoting the efficient cause. (3) By reason of. (4) After, next. (5) At. (6) In. (7) The term from. (8) For that reason. (9) Out of. (10) From [ever since]. (11) Against. (12) For [as to, in respect to]. (13) After, from the time that, or next to. (14) For, on our side, or party. (15) On. (16) With. (17) In comparison of. (18) As far as from, or hard by. (19) With respect to an object. (20) The moving cause, for, out of, by reason of. (21) The part affected. (22) A relation to the subject, as to, as for. (1) Senectus abstrahit a rebus gerendis, Cic. de Sen. 5. (2) Laudatur ab his, culpatur ab illis, *Hor. B.

B, b. The second letter, but first consonant, in the alphabet. It is a labial, shutting the lips, which A had opened. Among the mutes it has a middle place and power, between the smooth and easy sound of P, and the aspirate and rougher sound of Ph, F, and V; every one of which in the derivation and inflection of words, is frequently, for the better sound, changed into some of the other; so from βοσκω comes pasco, from απο, ab; from labor, lapsus; from scribo, scripsi; b, always continuing in the inflection of such words before a vowel; but, because it would otherwise be too hard, before a consonant, it is softened into p. So from rubeo, rufus; from θριαμβος, triumphus; φαλαινα, balæna; from βρεμω, fremo; from γιλβος, gilvus; from ⲃⲏⲓ, avus: Nay, in some Latin words, b and v are indifferently written; as sebum and sevum; so also b and p, as Publicola and Poplicola; b and f, as bubalus and bufalus. B, is sometimes inserted in the middle of words for the better sound, as in ambages, ambio, amburo, &c. B, is servile in the inflection of the dative and ablative plural of the third, fourth, and fifth, declensions of Latin nouns; as likewise of the preterimperfect tense, and also the future, in the first and second conjugations. B, in ancient writings, denotes Balbus, or Brutus; B, F. in the preface to Laws or Contracts, Bonum factum; B. AV. Bonis avibus, or Bonis auspiciis.

C.

C, c. The third letter, but second consonant, may indeed be copied immediately from the Hebrew ג being exactly the same, only in complaisance to our way of writing, turning towards the right; yet is much more probably framed from the Greek Γ, its right and perpendicular line, for the more ease and quick despatch in writing, instead of an angle, degenerating into a semicircle. For it is evident, that the Latin letters are many of them exactly the same with the Greek; and most of the rest, which are common to both tongues, differ no more, than haste, convenience of writing, or perhaps some novel and growing depravation might probably occasion. And I may add also, that many words, natives of Greece, were made denizens of Rome, without any formality of changing their garb, especially those of Doric families: others again, in pretty near proportion between their number of words and letters, suffer some change, to be more civilly treated there: besides, it is notorious that the Roman youth were anciently taught both to read and write their own language by Greek masters. This I judge proper to observe here once for all, and proceed. The rank which C holds in the Latin alphabet, answering that of Γ in the Greek, is a farther evidence of this extraction: besides, when the Greeks in their own letters express a pure Latin word, where this letter is found, they commonly substitute Γ, or Κ, for Caius Cæsar, writing Γαιος Καισαρ. Yea, in many Latin words c and g are indifferently written; as Caius, Cnæus, or Gaius, Gnæus. But before I go farther, I must do a piece of justice to this letter, by declaring, that, though it acknowledges the Greek Γ its parent, yet it may challenge the same regard from the Latin letters g and k, and, in the opinion of some learned men, from q also: the first whereof was not known to the Romans till after the first Punic war. This is plainly proved from the royal laws, where Acnom is writ for Agnum, Acrom for Agrum; and that famous remaining piece of antiquity, the monumental pillar of Duilius, where we read Lecio pucnando.l, exfociont, &c. for Legio pugnando, effugiunt. As for K, it appears never to have been much used, and is now so obsolete, that it is not written in more than two or three Latin words, where c is always indifferently, or perhaps better, used. And for Q, the indifferency found in writing very many Latin words therewith, or with C, as cur, or quur; quum, or cum; locutus, or loquutus; cottidie, or quotidie, has induced many critics to deduce its original from c. But this shall be considered in its proper place. The name of C, if we attend to analogy, is always Ke, as is its sound before all vowels; never Se. And here, with much reluctance, I remark, that foreigners, who own we understand Latin perfectly, and write it correctly, account us little better than barbarians, in several parts of pronunciation; but none more justly, than our depraved sound of this letter before æ, œ, e, i, and y, as if it were S; which at the same time our learned men confess to differ from the ancient usage of Greece, and Rome, to be unreasonable in itself, and to introduce a strange confusion in words and things; so that cædo, and sedo; cæpi, and sepi; census, and sensus; cicer, and siser; cygni, and signi, and many thousands more, have, with us, one and the same sound. Hence also it comes to pass, that its sound is entirely lost after S; so that cæna, and scena; celeris, and sceleris, and innumerable words of the same kind, are confounded. This I humbly leave to the consideration and redress of the learned schoolmasters of this kingdom, as very well deserving it, and return to its true sound; which is the same with that usurped by the exploded K, and stands related to the harder sound of g, as p to b; and therefore in the inflection of words, g before a vowel is changed into c before a consonant; as ago, actum, not agtum; lego, lectum; not legtum; just as scribo, scriptum. Neither ought it to be sounded with an aspirate, as the modern Italians do, who say chichindela, Chichero, &c. for cicindela, Cicero. Concerning its intercourse with s, and t, the tenuis of the third class of mutes, I rather choose to treat in the dissertation upon those letters, lest I be too tedious in this.

Censor, ōris. m. verb. [a censeo] qui agebat censum tam de personis, quam rebus; sic enim vett. Gloss. Census απογραφη, αξιας αποτιμησις. (1) He who executed the Census, first instituted by Servius Tullius, and managed as part of his kingly office. In the consular state, the consuls themselves executed it, as part of their business, till the year of the city, 311, when, by reason they had too much employment on their hands, the senate were willing, for divers politic reasons, to ease them of this part of their burden, by creating two of these officers, Papirius and Sempronius; whose office then being only to take an account of the number of the people, and the value of their estates, and to assess them accordingly, was looked upon as mean; but afterwards, the succeeding censors, upon the accession of more business, gained so great authority, that even the emperors themselves exercised their office. They were to censure and punish evil, and indecent manners, such as the law took no cognizance of, by degrading the senators, and knights, and disfranchising the commonalty. They had the care of public buildings, bridges, and ways, making and abrogating certain laws, &c. (2) Met. It is also taken for a censurer, critic, or other severe person. (1) Hor. Ep. 2. 2. 110.
